In the passion of the civil rights campaigns of 1964 and 1965, Jonathan Kozol gave up the prospect of a promising and secure career within the academic world, moved from Harvard Square into a poor black neighborhood of Boston, and became a fourth grade teacher.

He has since devoted nearly his entire life to the challenge of providing equal opportunity within our public schools to every child, of whatever racial origin or economic level. He is, at the present time, the most widely read and highly honored education writer in America.

Now, in the major book of his career, published in September 2012, Jonathan tells the stories of triumph of inner-city children he has known for a quarter-century in the poorest urban neighborhoods of the United States, as well as the more somber tales of those who have not survived. Hope and glory, sorrow and despair, are intermingled in these pages, but the transcendent victories of many of the children Jonathan's readers have already come to love have left him with a cautious optimism as he looks into the years ahead.

When he is not with teachers in their classrooms, or at universities and colleges speaking to our future teachers, Jonathan is likely to be found in Washington, where he has spent much of the past two years attempting to convince his friends within the Senate leadership to radically revise the punitive aspects of the federal testing law No Child Left Behind.

The College of Education focuses on improving the quality of leaders in the fields of education, health, human services, and communities of learning, including business and industry. Its mission includes serving as the base for research, development, professional experience and creative innovation; using academic disciplines and services within the university, as well as in collaboration with schools and colleges; and working cooperatively with governmental units, private agencies, and foundations.

The University of North Texas Educational Leadership Program is one of the largest educational leadership programs in the state. The curriculum challenges students to think creatively in organizing educational services and solving problems encountered in the real world. The program also supports both public and private educational sectors by providing advancement and application of knowledge through research and creative activities in the Dallas/Fort Worth area and beyond. Visit http://www.coe.unt.edu/teacher-education-and-administration to learn more about the program.
